Innovating for Our Green Future

It is difficult to navigate a world whose only constant is change. Each growing season is altogether unique with times to celebrate garden victories and times of trialing weather patterns and pest pressures. When working with living things, the landscape is already dynamic and unwieldy. It is even more unpredictable with the destabilizing symptoms of climate change. Just as the ecosystems around us work to adapt quickly to what may become the new normal, we are tasked with innovating our growing techniques, businesses, organizations and social structures to meet the needs of the moment. It is today's innovation that will ensure that we are able to grow food, build community and step boldly into our bright future.

Littleton Food Co-op - Danielle Shaw, Director | Littleton, New Hampshire

The Littleton Food Co-op was founded by a passionate group of local citizens in 2006 who came together and formed an exploratory committee in hopes of creating such a place. In May of 2009, after thousands of volunteer hours from the community and priceless help from the Hanover New Hampshire Co-op, the doors opened for business. Danielle Shaw, one of the Directors of the local business, recounts the challenges faced starting something brand new in their town. "The early days weren't easy, but we eventually hit a stride that's brought us the success we've had to this day. Since then, we've tried to pay it forward and honor the cooperative principles by encouraging other co-op startups the way that Hanover did for us."

The community played an integral role in the founding of the Co-op, and Danielle believes it is also the key to their success. "We wouldn't be here at all if it weren't for the incredible people that make up our members, local farmers, staff, and board. A collection of very passionate individuals brought us into existence and their continued support is what has enabled us to keep making strides forward."

When it comes to placing the Littleton Co-op High Mowing Seed Rack, Danielle and her team innovate their displays to highlight the excitement of spring. "Come late February, our seeds are displayed in the Produce department of our store. We also feature cut flowers, early plant starts, and houseplants in this same space. The combination really comes together to get people into the change of season. Sometimes, we can't keep the rack stocked; it feels like I've become best friends with some of High Mowing's sales reps! They're always so wonderful. The yearly appearance of the seeds always gets people excited. You can see the light come on. Seeds mark a specific turning point for that hope."

For Danielle, her work at the Co-op may be rooted in the basic tasks of running a local business, but she feels deep fulfillment in her heart for the role she gets to play, serving the present moment and laying groundwork for a green future. "I like to say it every chance I get, but working at the Littleton Food Co-op helps me sleep at night. Being a human can be tough these days. I can go to our Operations Manager at any time and show him the new compostable bags I've found. I can attend our Green Team meetings and hear what my coworkers are working on to better address sustainability in our business. At any given time, we can course-correct and make steps toward a better future. Anyone can get that ball rolling. Working in a space that prioritizes these conversations and visions has worked wonders for keeping perspective. I can tell myself, 'Okay. There are lots of people working on this. People care! People are doing their best. Maybe we've got a shot.'"

About High Mowing Organic Seeds

High Mowing Organic Seeds started in 1996 when our owner and founder, Tom Stearns, grew a handful of organic vegetable varieties in his backyard and offered the seeds for sale to his neighbors and friends. Today, true to these mission-driven roots, we offer 100% organic and non-GMO vegetable, herb and flower seeds selected to thrive in organic gardens and on organic farms. Our goal is to leverage the power of seeds with the hope of making our world a better place.

Independent: We are a small company, run by a staff of just 40 year-round full-time employees operating out of our single location in northern Vermont.

Farm-based: Like the gardeners who buy our seeds, we're growers, too: we grow all of the varieties we offer in field trials before they are added to our assortments, to assure quality and consistency.

Organic & Non-GMO: We believe in an inspired view of the future based on better stewardship of our planet and food systems through safe seed production practices.
